Phoenix – Barry Wong, candidate for Arizona Corporation Commission, announced his candidacy today by pledging to support clean renewable energy (solar, wind, geothermal and biomass) as part of diverse energy production, and ensure quality and reliable water for Arizona’s future. In addition he will work to protect Arizonans from investment fraud.

“A strong leader must secure adequate energy and water for Arizona’s future generations. I have the education, experience and commitment to work for people across the state to accomplish that goal,” Wong said.

Barry Wong was appointed by the Governor to the five-member statewide elected Corporation Commission to complete the remainder of the term of a Commissioner who had resigned. During his tenure from July 2006 to January 2007 he was involved with all aspects of Commission work including renewable energy, regulatory hearings, securities law, and railroad and pipeline safety.

Barry Wong is a native Arizonan with a B.S. in Accounting from ASU and a Law Degree from the U of A. He previously served four terms in the Arizona House of Representatives championing technology, renewable energy, higher education and small business.

Wong is a Republican running for one of three open seats in the September 2008 primary.
